States Near Agreement To Share River Water

By KRISTEN HENDERSON

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Representatives for New Mexico and six other Western states that rely on the Colorado River have come enough close to an agreement that each side is scheduled Friday to be at the table for negotiations.

The states are trying to hammer out an agreement setting guidelines for the upper- and lower-basin states and their use of Colorado River water. The states are Nebraska, South Dakota, Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Arizona, California, Nevada and New Mexico.

The negotiations will take place for the next five years, but an agreement could be completed within the next year. Each side will have five opportunities to make a counter offer before the negotiations end.

The states have met at least 14 times in the past month, and the Colorado River is expected to be the topic of discussions at this meeting.

The agreement would set the stage for the states to move forward on a variety of issues, including how much water each state is entitled to and how much water is available for the states to use.

The states have been working on the issue for more than a year, and the negotiations are expected to be finalized by the end of the month.
